

Abstract

A method is described for the identification of enzymes with a desired activity by random production of a large collection of enzyme variants, the synthesis of these variants in host organisms, their presentation on the surface of the organisms and the isolation of the enzyme variants with the desired characteristics by detection of the covalent deposition of the reaction product on the surface of the host organism.